Gregory S. Galdabini brings to the firm more than twenty years of experience developing and executing nuanced messages on complex and sensitive public policy issues including financial regulation, international trade, health care policy, labor issues, taxes, and the economy. Greg provides HudsonLake clients with high-level strategic guidance, message development, and content creation.

Prior to joining HudsonLake, Greg was senior director of Editorial Communications at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and a member of the Communications Department's senior leadership team. Greg helped shape and disseminate the organization's pro-business and pro-free enterprise advocacy messages targeted at Congress, the White House, regulatory agencies, the business community, the media, and the general public. Greg's responsibilities included drafting speeches, talking points, and op-eds for the Chamber's CEO and chairman of the board and serving as editor-in-chief of the Chamber's blog and its content marketing website, FreeEnterprise.com; its monthly member print publication, and e-newsletters. He led a team of writers, copyeditors, graphic designers, and photographers that was named a finalist for the 2012 In-house PR Team of the Year award by PRWeek.

Previously, Greg was a senior editor at Aspen Publishing in Gaithersburg, Maryland, where he both wrote and served as managing editor for a number of health care trade newsletters read by leading hospitals, medical groups, and insurance companies.

In his first Washington job, Greg was a political researcher at the Republican National Committee, where he helped launch the organization's video research operation and tracked political news that proved instrumental in congressional and presidential campaigns.

A California-native, Greg graduated from the University of California-Santa Barbara with a B.A. in political science. He resides in Arlington, Virginia, with his wife Caroline, a Director at Citi Private Bank, and their two daughters, Isabella and Anna.
